INTRODUCTION: THE YEAR OF UKIP

The 2013 county elections will be remembered as the year the UK Independence Party broke through in a serious way into English local government; in several cases becoming a significant presence on county councils.

English counties are the very best set of elections for the Conservative Party: they cover the most staunchly Tory-supporting, mainly rural, parts of England and many of the larger Labour-voting towns within them have been removed to become their own unitary authorities. On top of that, the last set of elections to these counties in 2009 were just about the very best the Conservatives could do in these counties: leaving Labour with just majority control of Durham (and even there Labour experienced unprecedented losses).

Ever since the Conservative melt-down year of 2003, when the party was left in overall control of just one county - Bucks - the Tories have been slowly rebuilding their base in the shires. Hampered a little - but only a little - by the fact that in 1997, 2001 and 2005 the county elections were held on the same day as the general election, they had rec

The big difference between 2009 and 2013 was that, four years earlier the Conservatives had been an insurgent opposition gearing up for a general election against a very unpopular Labour government, while in 2013 they (along with the Lib Dems) were the incumbents. In other words, it was going to be impossible for the Conservatives to emerge from these elections with anything like the number of councils and councillors they entered them with.

Conservative	1,940,757	34.7	- 9.0
Labour	1,187,334	21.2	+ 7.8
UKIP	1,121,202	20.1	+15.6
Liberal Democrat	779,381	13.9	- 10.9
Independent	251,357	4.5	- 0.2
Green	195,034	3.5	- 1.0
Residents Assoc.	43,980	0.8	+ 0.1
BNP	12,316	0.2	- 2.3
Others	59,466	1.0	- 0.4

While that became the reality, the Conservatives did comparatively well: better, arguably, than a party of government in the mid term during a recession should. That assertion is limited to their seat and council haul: it is not a reflection on their vote share, which haemorhaged, principally to UKIP.

But, in one of the ironies of first past the post, in many ways it was UKIP that made sure the Tories didn't do far worse than they deserved - and the reason for that is that UKIP didn't just take votes from the Conservatives. Like-for-like, they did even more damage to the Liberal Democrats who, in 2009, were the principal challengers across most of the country. The result: Conservative councillors held - and in many cases actually gained - seats on vote shares far worse than four years earlier.

In a handful of counties the Conservatives lost more than enough seats to lose control, but then also gained sufficient a handful (almost always from the faded Lib Dems) back to cling onto power. By draining more support from the only other realistic winner in seat after seat up and down the land, UKIP in fact enabled the Tories to do far better than they would have done with that (dismal) vote share in a three-cornered race.

There was another reason why UKIP proved to be a crutch, rather than the intended bludgeon, to the Conservatives: it was that their vote was spread remarkably evenly across the entire country. Where they stood, they usually polled better than 15% and incredibly rarely over 40%. So, much like the former SDP/Liberal Alliance in the 1983 general election which won 28% of the vote and just 3.5% of the seats, UKIP ended up with a stack of votes and very few councillors to show for it. Rather than the narrative that UKIP had done well, the truth was they had done very poorly given the vote share they polled. It is a political cliche but second place wins no prizes in first past the post elections.

With just a few exceptions, UKIP managed to win only where the vote share needed to triumph was low - where Labour, Lib Dems and/or independents siphoned off a large chunk of the vote. So in staunch Conservative wards, UKIP could poll 30-40% - amazingly impressive in itself - but where the Conservatives still retained the vast majority of the remaining 60-70% of the vote it counted for nowt. But where the Conservative ceiling was far lower; where Labour or the Lib Dems could take 20-35% between them, those were the wards UKIP could often muster enough strength to sneak through.

But, as well as missing out on scores of seats relatively narrowly, it also meant that the bulk of UKIP councillors now sit on precarious majorities. Of their 145 seats, just 25 were won with majorities of more than 10%. 84 were won by less than 5%.

Of course, even retaining as many councils as they did, these results still caused a post-election storm for David Cameron as backbench unrest - principally over Europe but also equal marriage - made the Conservatives appear divided. So imagine how much worse things would have been had the UKIP tide encorached just a few more feet up the Conservative shore.

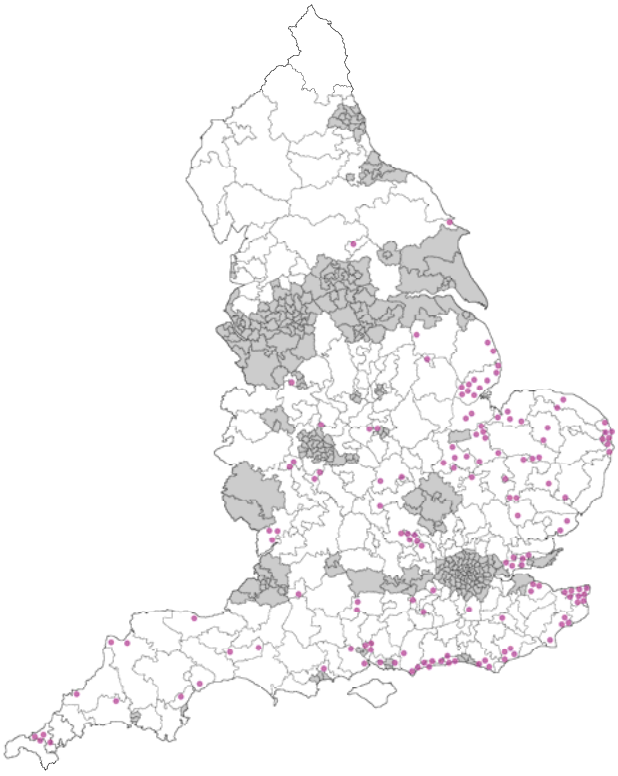
There are a score of significant county councils which the Tories now retain on a knife-edge: Essex, Kent, Somerset, Staffordshire, Suffolk, Leicestershire and Worcestershire. If marginal-rich counties like Essex and Kent, with hardly any record of anything other than majority Conservative rule, had fallen - especially given the huge 2009 majorities they were sitting on - David Cameron's position may have been untenable.

Or, to put that another way, had UKIP done the same amount of damage to the Conservatives across the rest of the south and Midlands as it did in eastern England, the Conservatives would have endured damage almost as severe as that terrible 1993 election.

East England was the epicentre of the UKIP quake. The six eastern counties of Lincolnshire, Cambridgeshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex and Kent returned 78 of the party's 148 councillors. UKIP polled the most votes in ten parliamentary constituencies throughout England - along with multiples of near misses - of which five were in these six counties and one: Boston & Skegness, produced a sizeable UKIP lead.

But looking at why UKIP polled well in a particular geographic region rather misses the point. UKIP derived its strength from particular types of community - it just so happened that a lot of those communities manifest in eastern England.

The type of area most inclined to elect UKIP was isolated, insular small coastal towns: towns that have really been hit hard by the recession but which, in many cases, have been struggling for decades. Where they were fishing towns and villages, an understandable hostility to the EU and its quota policies has been ingrained, but the problems go far deeper. Examples of these types of town include Skegness, Yarmouth, Camborne, Redruth, Weymouth, Portland (where UKIP didn't actually win but polled very strongly), Clacton, Margate, Ramsgate, Folkestone and Peacehaven. Couple that with areas that have received high leels of east European immigrants in recent years: North Cambridgeshire and South Lincolnshire, for example, and the UKIP map takes shape.



Another type of area UKIP thrived was in more affluent small towns and villages where there are large concentrations of senior citizens and a regimental presence; especially where there was a cause to unite behind. So, in central Buckinghamshire, opposition to High Speed Rail running through the area helped elect UKIP councillors. UKIP also thrived in Tunbridge Wells, Andover, Farnham, Christchurch, UKIP also did well in new towns - and here they pose a real threat to Labour. Several new towns no longer participate in county elections, but in places like Basildon, Harlow and Redditch UKIP won almost a third of the vote: it will be touch and go who wins towns like this. Even in the towns Labour does better in, like Stevenage, UKIP took a hefty share, and as many new UKIP voters here came from Labour as came from anywhere else.

UKIP's writ did not run everywhere. The party does not play well in areas that have large black and minority ethnic communities, but there are not many of those in this round of elections. They did much better in wards based on towns or large villages rather than truly rural areas. Large parts of the north and the midlands did not elect a single UKIP councillor; though that was in part down to far lower numbers of UKIP candidates being fielded: where they stood they polled well, albeit not usually well enough to win. But UKIP really struggled in towns that were affluent, thriving, professional and academic: Oxford and Cambridge, Banbury, Chelmsford, Cheltenham, Worcester, Salisbury, Basingstoke, Exeter, High Wycombe, St Albans, Watford, Hemel Hempstead and so on.

One final UKIP phenomenon manifested in these elections: where they had already established themselves, the party's advance was far more tepid than in areas they broke into for the first time in 2013. Not only did UKIP actually lose seats in Nottinghamshire and Staffordshire: the two counties it broke into in 2009, but in some of the counties they have polled best in in recent years, especially in the south west, UKIP really struggled to add votes.

The main reason UKIP fell back in Staffs and Notts was that these are traditionally Labour-leaning counties - and UKIP did well in traditionally Labour wards in these counties. Given 2009 was such an horrific year for Labour and that they were now three years into opposition nationally, there would inevitably be a rebound. The question was: how much of one?

Labour had a number of increasingly difficult hurdles to surmount. The lowest-lying was to recapture the two Midlands counties that it only loses in atrociously bad electoral cycles: Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire. Labour cleared that hurdle easily. But every subsequent one it fell short of to differing degrees. The next target was to regain overall control of Lancashire and Northumberland. It missed both, albeit taking minority control of both. Staffordshire and Cumbria were outside bets: the first stayed Conservative, the second remained hung.

There are scores of county council seats Labour won in 2005 - the election before last - itself not an especially impressive set of elections for the party, that it failed to win back in 2013.

In counties that Labour has not won majority control of, but has been the largest party in a coalition quite often - Norfolk, Suffolk, Warwickshire, Gloucestershire, Labour barely influenced the results: it was principally UKIP that determined who ended up in control of this swathe of middle England. Northamptonshire: a county Labour won in its years in government, was not remotely close to being a Labour gain, even taking into account hostile boundary changes for the party.

Nonetheless, 2013 was a recovery from 2009: they won over a million votes, adding 263,164 to their total on a lower turnout. That amounted to just over a 20% share, compared to 13% in 2009.

Labour supporters will want to look at the results in wards within the key constituencies, and 48 of those voted in these elections (that is: 48 entire seats, excluding those where part voted in these elections and part did not). County ward boundaries and parliamentary boundaries do not align perfectly.

And indeed, of those 48 - kept in the 2010 general election order of margin, Labour polled the most votes in 29. But their margin of victory in many of those 29 was far from convincing: even in some of the very easiest for them to win like Broxtowe, Lancaster & Fleetwood and Stroud. The underlying problem for Labour is that there is a high probability of a swing back to the Conservatives from these mid-term elections: be it because there usually is between the mid-term point and the general election; or because the economy appears to be growing strongly; or simply because most of these seats are represented by first-time MPs who tend to get a double-incumbency bonus.

So results like those in North Warwickshire, Carlisle, Burnley, Ipswich and Cannock Chase convince that Labour could withstand such a swing-back, but results in places like Redditch, Warwick and Northampton do not. And the rest are borderline, hingeing entirely on what happens to the horde of UKIP voters that emerged in these elections.

The Liberal Democrats had another dismal election, whether compared to 2009 or the three post-2010 general election council rounds. After losing their two remaining counties in 2009, they lost scores of councillors and fell from a clear second place to fourth behind UKIP.

One of the key Liberal Democrat claims since the bottom fell out of their vote share has been that, while they are getting wiped out in areas that they are not competitive in, they are able to hang on to the areas they hold. An example of that being so was the Eastleigh by-election, held shortly before the county elections - indeed, they also polled the most votes across the Eastleigh wards in those elections too.

But it's not necessarily true more widely. It's certainly the case that the Lib Dems are defying their national poll slump in seats they have a history in - but that doesn't mean they're going to be able to survive at the 2015 general election.

The Lib Dems held twenty of the constituencies voting in 2013 - again, we are only including whole seats in this list, not seats that include areas that did not vote this year. Of those 20 they polled the most votes in just 9. In those seats where their principal opponent is Labour, the Lib Dems lost, substantially.

How the 20 Lib Dem county constituencies voted

1.	Norwich South	4,903	19.1
2.	St Austell & Newquay	534	2.4
3.	Somerton & Frome	3,084	9.4
4.	St Ives	3,149	12.6

18.	Wells	4,860	17.6
19.	Yeovil	2,319	8.2
20.	Westmorland & Lonsdale	5,406	20.6

The somewhat better news for the Lib Dems was that they managed to offset some of those losses by notionally gaining eight seats from the Conservatives.

There are notes of caution here: the Lib Dems routinely outpoll the Conservatives in places like Chelmsford, Harborough, Watford, St Albans and Maidstone in council elections, but never translate that local success into national victory.

Buckinghamshire
No change: Conservative majority of 23

Buckinghamshire is the most solid of the Conservative shires. In over 100 years it has never once slipped from their control. Almost all of the county is very safely Conservative, but traditionally the Lib Dems have dominated Aylesbury town in the middle of the county. Labour occasionally win a ward or two in Wycombe in the south. This year rebellion stirred in Bucks: opposition to the HS2 rail-line helped elect six UKIP councillors, all from central Buckinghamshire wards affected by the proposals. Labour also pulled off arguably their most spectacular gain anywhere, winning the Buckinghamshire West ward on a 12% swing.

Cambridgeshire
Conservatives lose to no overall control. Conservative minority

Huntingdonshire, which is now part of Cambridgehire, is traditionally one of the safest Conservative areas in the county: former Prime Minister John Major, whose seat it was, won a majority of 36,230 here in 1992. Today, Huntingdon town has a UKIP councillor, along with eleven other areas. Ramsey ward in North West Cambridgeshire is - by far - the safest UKIP ward in England. But Cambridgeshire is, effectively, two counties. The north has a lot more in common, politically, with West Norfolk and South Lincolnshire. South Cambridgeshire is a rapidly growing, affluent commuter-belt region centred on the City of Cambridge. This is diametrically not the sort of area UKIP thrives: this is liberal and Liberal Cambridgeshire. Labour continued its revival in the city, winning the majority of seats there and a lead of 11% over the Lib Dems. But Labour has no easy targets beyond Cambridge itself. UKIP neds a 5% swing to become the largest party in the county, while a swing of just 0.8% will give the Tories back overall control.

Cornwall unitary authority
No overall control; Lib Dem/Independent coalition

Cornwall is a massive local authority: it is over 75 miles long and has a council of 122 members. Because it has so many councillors they represent very small wards of than 4,000 voters: and that makes all politics very local - to succeed, candidates need to know their patch.

In its inaugural election of 2009 the Lib Dems lost control of Cornwall and the Conservatives became the largest party, albeit well short of a majority. This time the Lib Dems recovered some ground, notably in North Cornwall, but remained remarkably weak in the south west of the county, while the Conservatives got thumped: down 18 seats net.

Labour won a decent presence with eight councillors; mainly in the south west (Penzance, Redruth, Camborne and Falmouth); UKIP also won 6 seats in the same areas (indeed it polled the most votes in the Camborne & Redruth constituency). A Green was also elected in St Ives town.

Although the Conservatives won the most votes, the Liberal Democrats were able to takeover the lead in a coalition withe the sizeable Independent group. Forty-four wards changed hands.

Cumbria
No overall control; no change. Labour and Lib Dem coalition

Cumbria is a remarkably polarised county where all three main parties have areas of astonishing strength and weakness. Labour usually dominates along the coast and in Carlisle; the Conservatives in Penrith and Cumberland, and the Lib Dems more recently in the lakelands of south Cumbria. There are wards where each party polled less than 3% and more than 76%.

Because there are more Labour areas here than for any other party it is Labour that usually either sneaks a narrow majority or takes the lead in forming a coalition. That did not happen in 2009 because the party was routed in Cumbria: losing to the Conservatives in Barrow and Carlisle and independents (mainly disgruntled ex-Labour councillors in Workington and Copeland). That enabled the Tories to lead a coalition with the Lib Dems for four years. In 2013 Labour recovered the ground it lost to the Conservatives and some, but not all, from the independents, but remained eight seats short of a majority. Hence, Cumbria is now run by a Lib/Lab coalition.

To take overall control next time Labour will need to sort out its problems with independents. If it can make some headway into Kendal, now dominated by the Lib Dems that would help too.

Derbyshire
Labour gain from Conservatives; majority of 22

If the rest of England had swung back to Labour to the extent Derbyshire did in 2013, there would be little dispute that the party was on course for a rapid return to government. Where, four years earlier, Labour had been ousted from swing wards in the marginal constituencies of High Peak, Amber Valley, Erewash and South Derbyshire, they came roaring back. The icing on the cake was a thorough rout of the Liberal Democrats in Chesterfield: they finished with just one seat in the city with the crooked spire and over 30 percentage points behind Labour.

Even here, though, things didn't run completely to plan. The Conservatives won most votes (but not most seats) in rapidly growing South Derbyshire and remained formidably strong in the new Mid Derbyshire constituency.

Devon
No change: Conservative majority of 14

Devon is a classic example of the destruction the Lib Dems experienced in 2013. This was a county they ran until 2009: today they have just nine county councillors. The Lib Dems were assailed from all sides: Labour in Exeter (which no longer looks like a marginal seat), UKIP in west and south Devon and the Conservatives in the north.

The Lib Dem erosion in North Devon will most worry the party - this is going to be a mighty difficult seat for them to hold, especially if long-serving MP Nick Harvey retires in 2015. Conversely, the Lib Dem vote held up very well in Newton Abbott at the other end of the county: the former Lib Dem MP William Younger-Ross won a council seat here and the new Tory MP does not yet have it locked down it appears.

Dorset
No change: Conservative majority of 9

Dorset is England's smallest county council with just 45 councillors. Aside from a marked Labour resurgence in Weymouth & Portland, very little occurred in the 2013 county elections. UKIP polled strongly in parts but only managed to get one councillor elected in the east of Dorset to show for it.

Nonetheless, Dorset highlighted two of the key types of community UKIP thrived in: on the one hand wealthy senior citizens displeased with Cameron Conservatism in the Christchurch end of the county; on the other struggling and remote working class fishing towns like Weymouth and Portland.

Labour managed to win Dorset South, which is centred on these twin towns in 2001 and 2005 but, even though it did well in these elections, with the amount of non-Tory votes leaking to UKIP they don't look able to repeat that feat in 2015.

The Lib Dems polled strongly in wards that make up about half of Mid Dorset and Poole North, which they hold on a knife-edge, but slipped back very slightly in West Dorset, the seat of Oliver Letwin, which they've long set their sights on but never managed to snag.

Durham unitary authority
No change: Labour majority of 62

Durham is the safest Labour county in England. But even here in 2009 the signs of just how deeply in trouble the party was manifested: the Conservatives making unprecedented headway into Chester-le-Street; the Lib Dems winning the City of Durham comfortably and an organised group of independents making deep headway across north and west Durham. In fact, had Durham still been a county council, with very many fewer councillors, it's possible Labour could have come close to losing overall control.

However, Durham is the second of our unitary counties with a massive council size (126 seats) to match. One of the features of such councils is that only the dominant party is able to contest all the seats - and that huge advantage kept Labour in control four years earlier. In 2013 Labour stormed back against the Lib Dems and Conservatives: between them they now hold just 13 seats; but they struggled again with the Independent groups, especially in the area around Consett in the north. Nonetheless, Labour won 94 of those 126 seats and it is fanciful to even entertain the notion that they might ever be ousted from this northern citadel.

East Sussex
Conservatives lose to no overall control. Conservative minority

Conservatives on East Sussex lost a net nine seats and with them majority control of the smaller half of this south coast county. Seven of those losses were to UKIP who won a chain of coastal seats from Peacehaven near Brighton to Bexhill near Hastings.

Labour also gained three seats in deprived Hastings and, with the Lib Dems maintaining their grip on Eastbourne (but not Lewes) the problem the Conservatives have with coastal communities was highlighted. Of the 23 seats fronting the sea the Conservatives won just 5. Of the 26 inland seats, they won all but 4.

Although the Conservatives are well short of a majority here they still have twice as many county councillors as their nearest opponent (Labour) and, with five independents felt confident enough to be able to govern in minority without any coalition.

Essex
No change: Conservative majority of 9

There are two very different Essexes: working class estuary and London borders Essex, and more rural, picturesque northern Essex, which is virtually indistinguishable from adjoining Suffolk. The Conservatives experienced big problems with estuary Essex in 2013, but did somewhat better in the north.

Nonetheless, the Conservatives went into the elections with a landslide majority of 43 and emerged with one of just 9. Some trimming of that huge former majority was inevitable this time but what was unexpected was the fragmentation of the opposition: there are 33 non-Conservative councillors now but the largest groups (three of them) have just nine members.

Seven groupings are represented on the county council including UKIP, who fared well in Thatcherite estuary Essex and in the isolated, struggling rural north-east of the county around Clacton. Greens also broke through in Rochford and Witham. The Lib Dems maintained their grip on Colchester and Brentwood (TOWIE country) but slipped back a little in Chelmsford. Labour had a poor night, however. On the one hand it is now a group again, having been reduced to just a single councillor in 2009; on the other its performances in key targets like Harlow and Basildon was poor, almost eclipsed by UKIP.

Gloucestershire
Conservatives lose to no overall control. Conservative minority

Unlike several of the counties that fell to no overall control this year, Gloucestershire has a history of being hung. That's partly because the Tories, Labour and Lib Dems all have strong areas from which they can usually count on a phalanx of their councillors.

Indeed, the principal reason the Tories were able to win an outright majority in 2009 was because Labour wasn't able to return many councillors that year. But in 2013 they recovered somewhat (though not especially strongly in the City of Gloucester) while the Tories suffered in west Gloucestershire at the hands of UKIP. The Lib Dems consolidated in Cheltenham, and regained seats lost four years earlier in Cirencester.
As with East Sussex, the Conservatives remained by far the largest party and decided to govern in a minority alone.

Hampshire
No change: Conservative majority of 12

The second of the super-counties (counties with more than a million voters in them) is also a rapidly-growing commuter county and is more homogenous than Essex. Homogenous in the sense that, with Portsmouth and Southampton removed, Labour is very much a bit-player: from the New Forest to Petersfield; and from Basingstoke to Canvey Island, this is staunch Conservative country with a Lib Dem stem through the middle of it.

The Lib Dems were hurt more than the Tories in 2013, losing a net 8 seats (to the Tories' 5) and unlike other counties, it wasn't just votes that leached to UKIP: it was seats, and especially in the Eastleigh area. Despite this, the Lib Dems won most votes in the Eastleigh constituency; "regained" Winchester and were very close in the Romsey area (though the Tories would almost certainly have held it.

UKIP won seats all over the county: Andover in the north west; Farnborough in the north-east; Bedhampton and Fareham in the south-east and the Southampton suburbs in the south-west; most notably in Fareham Crofton, where young UKIP councillor Chris Wood gained his seat on a 34% swing.

Labour may now be bit-players but their support is concentrated principally in Basingstoke - where they can win one, maybe two further seats. Basingstoke is a growing town and that's bad news for the Conservatives in the long-run, because the moment semi-rural Loddon ward is removed from the constituency it becomes very much a Labour target.

Hertfordshire
No change: Conservative majority of 15

The psephology of New Towns is something an entire book could be written about, and a great deal of it would be devoted to Hertfordshire and its surrounds. The first new town: Letchworth, is here. So too are Stevenage, Welwyn Garden City, Hatfield and Hemel Hempstead. Harlow and Milton Keynes lie just over the boundaries.

The Tories do not do well in the new towns (Hemel and Letchworth excepted) at county level, nor in the older towns: St Albans and Watford. But fortunately for them, Herts is much more than these towns: it includes affluent and strongly Conservative home-county commuter-belt interspersed with equally Conservative agrarian countryside.

Nonetheless, the 2013 result was excellent for the Conservatives; a fully firing Labour Party should be able to remove the Tory majority here. One of the main reasons the Conservatives did so well was because UKIP failed to make much impact: no seats won and just 18% of the vote - far below all the other home counties.

Kent
No change: Conservative majority of 6

As with Essex, Kent Conservatives went into the 2013 elections with a huge majority: 64 seats, having almost wiped Labour off the council in 2009. But they emerged with that 64 seat lead trimmed to just 6, and had Labour been firing on all cylinders again the almost certain reality of a loss of control. UKIP stormed the county: their Kent contingent of 17 councillors is the largest anywhere (though Lincolnshire's 16 is proportionally larger because it is a smaller council). And, unlike most of England, UKIP's vote was sufficiently concentrated as to give them the lead in two constituencies: Sittingbourne & Sheppey and Thanet South; and run the Tories very close in Folkestone & Hythe and Thanet South.

Thanet and Sittingbourne are not safe Conservative seats: they were both Labour until 2010 and a huge chunk of this new UKIP vote is ex-Labour. Indeed, so weak was Labour's recovery in Kent that this is one of only three counties where the party lost a seat in 2013 it held in dire 2009: Ramsgate (the others being Warwickshire, to the Greens; and Northumberland, to the Conservatives). Elsewhere in the county was a little better: Labour narrowly "won" Gravesham but was adrift in both Dover and Dartford.

The Lib Dems stood still in Kent: gaining one, losing one. But they again polled strongly in Maidstone - the county town, outpolling the Tories across the Maidstone & The Weald constituency.

Lancashire
No change: No overall control; Labour minority

Although Lancashire is technically a council that didn't change: no party had a majority after the 2009 elections and no party had a majority after 2013's, control did switch from the Conservatives to Labour. That was due to Labour gaining 22 seats: still not enough to return them to their pre-2009 levels but enough to lead the Tories by four seats.

Half of Labour's gains came in the south-east of the county, where it swept the Lib Dems from Burnley and the Tories from Rossendale and Accrington. Another eight came from the south west: principally Chorley and West Lancashire: parliamentary seats Labour appears to be able to hold nowadays whatever the political weather. But their results were more patchy the further north the county progresses: Labour were far adrift in South Ribble and the Lib Dems proved far more resilient in Pendle (where they have deeper, longer-grown roots) than Burnley: they actually gained two seats there. In both Lancaster and Morecambe: the two northern marginals, Labour struggled, though they eked out narrow wins in both.

Labour has got power back in Lancashire, but this result showed that, even in the north, the party isn't performing as well as it should in mid-term, in opposition, in a county trending its way.

Leicestershire
No change: Conservative majority of 5

Leicestershire is a county dominated by its county town to an extent unparalleled. Even though Leicester no longer elects to county hall, being a Unitary Authority in its own right, most of the county surrounding it is commuter dormitories and satellite towns that owe their existence to the city at its centre.

Because most of these satellite suburbs are affluent and predominantly white (with a growing middle-class Asian population) they are not so great for Labour. The Lib Dems dominate the southern suburbs in Oadby, Wigton and Blaby, and more recently have grown strong in the western suburbs of Bosworth and Burbage Castle too.

Labour is stronger on the outskirts of Leicestershire: amid the old coalmining countryside of Coalville and the old railway town of Loughborough. But Labour probably didn't perform strongly enough in either to win back those two seats in 2015.

Leicestershire with its affluent liberal activism isn't ideal hunting ground for UKIP but the party managed two gains in the north-western suburbs of Leicester, albeit by tiny margins.

Lincolnshire
Conservatives lose to no overall control. Conservative minority

Whereas the UKIP tide stopped just short of removing the Conservative majority in most southern and midland counties, in Lincolnshire it flooded them out of control. Going in with a massive majority of 45, the Tories lost a net 25 while UKIP gained 16; most in the south-east of the county in Boston and Skegness.

The east coast of Lincs is a sea of UKIP purple today: in the Boston & Skegness constituency UKIP polled 42% to the Tories' 30%. But UKIP triumphed elsewhere too: in Gainsborough in the far north-west; in the City of Lincoln; in the rural surrounds of Louth; in the usually Labour-leaning coastal town of Mablethorpe; and in Spalding in the far south.

Labour regained a handful of seats in Lincoln, and took both Louth town divisions, one in Grantham and the isolated southern parish of Deeping St James. The Lib Dems, once quite strong in northern Lincolnshire, were almost obliterated, but Lincolnshire's bevvy of independents remained strong.

Norfolk
Conservatives lose to no overall control.
Labour/UKIP/Lib Dem/Green coaltion

Norfolk completes the triumvirate of eastern counties UKIP ousted the Conservatives from control of (Lincs and Cams being the other two). But Norfolk is a more complex county than the other two: Labour is established beyond just the county town, which in itself is much larger than either Cambridge or Lincoln. Indeed, there is a rural Labour tradition in Norfolk that has faded but still gives them respectable votes, especially in coastal north Nofolk. Labour gained 11 seats in 2013: three from the Greens in Norwich and the rest from the Tories in Yarmouth and Kings Lynn.

But UKIP eclipsed them, picking up 14 seats right across the county, but especially in Great Yarmouth - where they polled the most votes. Rural west Norfolk is part of the fen area that spreads across Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire and UKIP did well here too.

The Lib Dems survived broadly in tact seat-wise, mainly due to their strength in North Norfolk, though they polled less than 30% of the vote in what appears to be a three-way marginal now.: just 4% separated the Lib Dems, Conservatives and UKIP. Despite losses in Norwich Norfolk remains their strongest county and they hung onto four seats, in the city's southern division. They seem more likely to win Norwich South next time than the Lib Dems are to hold it, though Labour was about 7% ahead in this constituency.

North Yorkshire
No change: Conservative majority of 18

The vast northern county of North Yorkshire covers over 3,300 square miles. But in thse 2 million acres of territory, very few surprises occurred. The Conservatives lost a net two seats mainly in the Selby area though they gained ground in marginal Harrogate. Labour gained six - in Selby and Scarborough town; while UKIP gained 2 seats: one in the isolated coastal town of Filey; the other - more surprisingly - in Harrogate (UKIP tending not to thrive in affluent urban areas that lean towards the Lib Dems).

North Yorkshire is one of two counties where the old Liberal Party continues to exist at a local level: they have two councillors, gaining one in the York satellite town of Ainsty.

Northamptonshire
No change: Conservative majority of 15

Northants looks like a safe Conservative county after the 2013 elections but that is wrong: Labour had a comfortable overall majority from 1993 to 2005; during which time they held five of the county's (then) six parliamentary seats too. This makes Northamptonshire atypical, though the Conservatives used a boundary change to shore themselves up significantly in 2013. On these new boundaries Labour probably would not have won Northants at any of the recent elections they actually did so; but nor can the fact that the party only has eleven councillors today be ascribed to this boundary review either.

Labour leached votes and council seats to the Lib Dems in its Northamptonshire heartland following the Iraq War; then lost the middle England swing vote that won it Wellingborough and Kettering to the Tories. It hasn't shown many signs of getting either back. Even if it eventually does, the best they could probably hope for on these boundaries is to lead a coaltion: but even that prospect is distant.

Northumberland unitary authority
No change: no overall control. Labour minority

Another northern county Labour failed to regain control of in 2013. Northumberland is also the only county the Conservatives advanced in compared to 2009. Perhaps these two facts are linked, though principally the Conservatives gained ground on the Liberal Democrats in the north of the county where Labour are weak. Labour, in contrast, virtually eradicated the Lib Dems from the densely populated south east of the county in Blyth and Wansbeck, gaining 14 seats.

But the Labour-Lib Dem battle does not explain Labour's loss of one of its Cramlington wards to the Conservatives; nor the fact that in other Cramlington seat the Tories won 79% of the vote.

Cramlington is one of the rarer northern New Towns, but like its surrounding towns and villages its history is coal-mining.

Labour came up two seats short of an overall majority but eleven seats ahead of the Conservatives. The main question for the Tories is whether they have done enough to recapture Berwick-Upon-Tweed constituency at the 2015 general election when long-standing Lib Dem MP Alan Beith requires. They may have.

Nottinghamshire
Labour gain from Conservatives; majority of 1

Nottinghamshire proved a much tougher county for Labour to regain than next-door Derbyshire, though in many ways the counties mirror each other. Both are counties divided into three distinct parts: a usually heavily Labour coal-mining interior; a Conservative-voting hinterland and an area of marginal suburbs surrounding their respective cities. Labour recovered in the traditional mining towns where its vote collapsed in 2009 - though not all that well in Ashfield where the Lib Dems proved resilient. But in marginal Sherwood Labour was comfortably ahead.

Labour also did well in the eastern suburbs of Nottingham: the Carlton and Arnold wards of Gedling constituency, but did markedly less well to the west, in Broxtowe (again where the Lib Dems maintained a strong presence).

The Tories were livid to have failed to deprive Labour an overall majority by just one seat but such were the numbers (the Tories finished with thirteen seats fewer) that even had they done so some form of Labour administration would have been inevitable. To build a larger majority, Labour will need to do far better against the Lib Dems in the west of the county.

Oxfordshire
Conservatives lose to no overall control. Conservative minority

It's somewhat appropriate that the counties of both Oxford and Cambridge fell from Conservative majority control in 2013, though in Oxon it was not down to the explosion onto the scene of UKIP. This is one of nine counties without any UKIP representation. Instead, this was what you might call a conventional loss of control: five seats lost to Labour (principally in the north Oxfordshire town of Banbury); four to the Lib Dems (in the marginal Abingdon constituency) and two to independents (in the south of the county).

Even when the Conservatives control Oxfordshire they can never do so comfortably because of their weakness in Oxford itself. As with Cambridge there are no Conservative councillors here and no realistic prospect of any. Boundary changes also hurt the Conservatives here: as well as the eleven seats they lost to other parties, they lost a further eight that were simply abolished (the Lib Dems lost three this way too; Labour: zero).

Without those additional abolished wards, the Conservatives would have retained Oxfordshire. As it is they fell just one seat short of a majority and were easily able to continue in power, albeit in a minority.

Shropshire Unitary Authority
No change: Conservative majority of 22

Shropshire is a tiny county of barely 200,000 electors yet, because it is a unitary authority, it still has a massive council of 74 members. As is the case in Durham and Wiltshire, only the dominant party - in this case the Conservatives - are strong enough to contest every ward and that is half the battle in counties like this: they picked up seven seats simply because the other parties did not contest those six wards (one elected two-members).

There was very little excitement here: just nine of the 74 seats changed hands. Labour recovered fairly well in the county town of Shreswbury, a constituency it would not expect to win other than in a landslide election, so to finish only 7% behind was a decent result.

Somerset
No change: Conservative majority of 3

The county the Lib Dems have the best chance of winning is Somerset. In 2013 all bar one of the county's parliamentary constituencies had Lib Dem MPs; yet for two cycles in a row Somerset declined to elect anything like enough Lib Dem councillors to put them in power. Although they remain competitive, 2013 was not a great year for the Lib Dems, losing ground most spectacularly in their fortress of Yeovil, where UKIP was able to take two seats off them. That has not happened for a long time.

Labour is phenomenally weak in Somerset: the areas they are (somewhat) stronger in lie in North East Somerset which has been established as a separate unitary authority. That leaves the party with just three areas of support: the outlying Taunton town of Wellington and larger Bridgwater, where it can usually win two seats.

On the basis of these results the Lib Dems will struggle to retain two of their Somerset constituencies in 2015: Wells and Somerton & Frome. But the 2009 county results painted a similar picture and they managed to win them at the 2010 general election.

Staffordshire
No change: Conservative majority of 6

There are two ways to paint the outcome of the results in Staffordshire. For Labour sympathisers, gaining control in one go after the 2009 election left them with just three county councillors was an impossibility. For those more sceptical of the party's performance at this election, Staffordshire is a Labour-leaning county that it wins in all but the very worst rounds of elections, and the fact they came up short in 2013 as well as 2009 suggests that their challenges remain significant.

The early results from Staffs gave Labour every reason to believe they were on course to retake power here because those results came from Cannock Chase, where they polled strongly. But the rest of the county was far more reticent and, when the dust had settled Labour had not done close to well enough in Tamworth, East Staffs, Stafford, Staffs Moorlands or even their safehaven of Newcastle-Under-Lyme.

Staffs was UKIP's strongest county in 2009: they won four seats here, mainly because disaffected Labour supporters in their heartlands in the north of the county switched in protest. It would always be a struggle for UKIP to hang on to these seats in a better Labour year and so it proved, though it was anomalous that they lost seats whilst putting on thousands of votes across the county as a whole. the Lib Dems were wiped off the map in Staffordshire: this has never been promising territory for the party and they will struggle to come back.

Suffolk
No change: Conservative majority of 3

The only East Anglian county not to slip from the Tories' hands in 2013 was Suffolk. Why did this county turn out so differently to Cambridgeshire and Norfolk?

The first reason is UKIP, which failed to field any candidates in the Suffolk Coastal constituency which includes Felixstowe. Given how coastal towns around the east of England voted in 2013, this may have cost them two or three seats: enough to remove the Tory majority. In Waveney (Lowestoft) further up the coast, UKIP performed better, though not quite as well as in Norfolk's adjoining port of Yarmouth. Nine seats would in other circumstances be an impressive first-time haul but in the context of their larger groups in Norfolk and Cambridgeshire it goes a long way to explaining why the Tories retained their majority.

The second reason was that the Conservative majority going into these elections was somewhat larger: they won 57 of the county's 75 seats in 2009 so, despite losing 18 of them, they still had a slight cushion after the 2013 dust had settled.

Labour is also somewhat weaker in Suffolk than Norfolk: the party roared back in Ipswich but stuttered in Waveney and their 15 seats is some way off their high water-mark. And the Lib Dems didn't manage to retain their seats, losing two to the Tories and two to Labour. If they'd held onto their two losses, to the Conservatives, Suffolk would have fallen to no overall control.

Surrey
No change: Conservative majority of 35

Surrey is, second only to Buckinghamshire, the safest Tory county. In these elections it had a case for being even safer because the UKIP challenge was much weaker south of London than north-west of it and there are a string of residents association councillors in this county whose voters in national election are staunch Conservatives.

The Tories lost just one seat net, gaining four, losing five. That figure could have been even-stevens were it not for the fact that they failed to put up a candidate in Guildford's Shalford division, gifting the seat to UKIP in the process.

It has been very difficult for any party other than the Tories to establish themselves in Surrey: Labour has just one ward in Stanwell, right on the edge of Hounslow below Heathrow, though in good years Labour can win a councillor in Camberley, Working, Guildford and Godalming. The Lib Dems have some strength in splodges across the county: Woking town, Guildford City, Dorking and Caterham. But they wax and wane wildly.

More continuity has been provided by the Epsom and Ewell residents association that monopolises the seats here, immediately south of the London Borough of Sutton. The other side of Chessington, in Esher and Molesey another set of residents have been able to put down roots and, added to the the two independents they are the joint largest opposition on the council.

The Tories contrived to lose control of Surrey in 1993; a remarkable anomaly blighting an otherwise serene century of Conservative control here. That reign continues unabated.

Warwickshire
Conservatives lose to no overall control. Conservative minority

Like Gloucestershire, Warwickshire more often than not ends up without a party in overall control of the county. That's because Warwickshire is a divided county with a usually heavily Labour north around Nuneaton countering a larger and more Conservative south around Stratford-on-Avon, Rugby and Warwick.

Labour's meltdown in 2009 was sufficient to hand a rare majority to the Conservatives but business as usual resumed in 2013 with the Tories just four seats in front, six short of a majority. The Lib Dems have some strength in the centre of the county in its three relatively affluent towns: Rugby, Leamington and Kenilworth; but they lost ground in the Stratford on Avon and the surrounding countryside.The Greens staged an impressive breakthrough, taking seats off the Tories and Labour on huge swings and in completely different parts of the county. UKIP got nowhere but didn't stand in many seats.

Labour led substantially in the North Warwickshire constituency which they shouldn't really have lost (they won by almost 15,000 in 1997) and less impressively in Nuneaton. Warwick & Leamington was neck-and-neck and they fell considerably short in Rugby.

West Sussex
No change: Conservative majority of 21

The county UKIP polled strongest in was not Lincolnshire, Norfolk, Kent or Cambridgeshire: it was West Sussex. The party polled nearly 29% and, in the county outside Crawley, virtually 30%. In no fewer than 30 wards UKIP polled above 30%; in six more than 40% and in one it surpassed 50%.

But this county showed most clearly how badly UKIP damages the Lib Dems: because while the Conservatives lost 15 seats, the Lib Dems lost 13. But whereas the Tories gained 12 back, the Lib Dems gained just 1. That's because by destroying the Lib Dems - first or second in the vast majority of wards in 2009 - they made sure that Conservatives held or gained seats.

The Conservatives would lose West Sussex on a 3.4% swing to UKIP and it would take one of roughly double that for UKIP to take overall control of a county of over 650,000 voters.

Wiltshire unitary authority
No change: Conservative majority of 28

Wiltshire is a county that has swung heavily from the Liberal Democrats since the 1990s, when they had a big overall majority here. Since then they've been really pusshed back to just their Chippenham (and surrounds) stronghold in the west of the county - this is part of the strongest Liberalregion in the country, neighbouring seats like Bath, Somerton & Frome and Thornberry & Yate.

Nowadays the only other part of the county that shows a marked aversion to the Conservatives is the South Wiltshire town of Salisbury: the only place nowadays that Labour is able to return any councillors from. There appears to be a growing independent force in Wiltshire - in contrast to most counties where independents are diminishing despite the rising unpopularity of party politics among voters. But as with other unitary authorities the sheer size of the council - 98 members - means that only the Conservatives are strong enough to field a full slate and, in 2013, that meant they got six councillors elected without a vote as their candidates were unopposed.

Worcestershire
No change: Conservative majority of 3

The Conservatives did well to hang onto control of Worcestershire in 2013 and they did so thanks to the three Malvern wards they gained from the Lib Dems.

Labour too did not do as well as it should in Redditch, Droitwich, Bromsgrove town and Kidderminster: it looks unlikely to regain either the Redditch or Worcester constituencies in 2015.
Worcestershire politics are distinctly rainbow-coloured (apt for a county with a ward called Rainbow Hill): nine different parties or affiliations are represented including still-present Kidderminster Hospital Health Concern and the Liberals, plus Greens, UKIP, Independents, Residents and the three larger parties. Worcestershire will be a top target for the Tories' opponents to remove them from overall control in 2017.
