Acknowledgements

Almost all the electoral information in this book is compiled from local authority websites, some (much) better than others. I am especially grateful to those councils which provided all information required - including turnout and electorate figures - on their websites without me needing to ask. I appreciate those electoral services officers who responded promptly to my requests for any missing data. A plague on the dozen councils that insisted I submit a Freedom of Information request to obtain this data that was sitting on their computers right in front of them when I asked for it.

I am of course grateful to Professors Colin Rawlings and Michael Thrasher and their Local Elections Centre for the 2015 data, their suggestions and advice as to how this information should be presented.

Finally, the local election results spreadsheet compiled by the Britain Elects team and put on their website, free, for people like me to download and then reorder and interpret was absolutely essential. Thank you.

Northern Ireland

Northern Ireland: the centre grows

The second set of elections to Northern Ireland's eleven "new" councils resulted in a fairly sizeable advance for the Alliance Party and for other non-sectarians including the Greens, People Before Profit and some independents. These gains came from very much smaller declines in the vote shares of larger parties, and the disappearance of other minor parties since 2014, notably UKIP and NI21. The Democratic Unionists - the largest party in the province - saw their vote rise slightly but they still lost eight council seats.

In fact you get a very different picture of the results if you view them in terms of seats gained and lost rather than votes won. From this perspective, the Alliance gain was more impressive: twenty gains, and the decline of all the more established parties was more stark: the Ulster Unionists down eleven, the SDLP and Traditional Unionist Voice (TUV) both down seven. Even Sinn Fein, which gained as many seats as it lost, fared poorly in its strongholds beyond West Belfast. And even for those who lost most there were consolations in specific local authorities.

Draw a line from Lough Foyle to Lough Neagh, and from Lough Neagh to the south eastern seaboard. West of this line nationalist parties dominate. East of it (though let's take Belfast out as it is an electoral market in its own right) the unionists do. Even if Northern Ireland voted for somewhat more diversity in 2019, those political preferences did not change.

Indeed, that headline result of the Alliance Party gaining a lot of ground is itself only really true in respect of the eastern, Unionist half of the province. All but two of the AP's gains in this election came in majority-Unionist districts. Independent gains, whilst both fewer and scattered more widely, were more likely to be found in majority-nationalist districts; though several of the independents were re-standing councillors who had left the party they had stood for in 2014.

But the results were more complicated than simply slicing the province into unionist and nationalist areas. For example, Sinn Fein did very badly in Foyle and Straban - the council covering the city of Derry which is heavily fought over with the SDLP; and both nationalist parties fared poorly in adjoining Fermanagh and Omagh district. Yet in Newry, Mourne and Down - "Bandit Country" as was during the troubles, it was the SDLP that faded to the benefit of Sinn Fein.

In contrast, the DUP did spectacularly badly in Lisburn and Castlereagh, immediately south west of Belfast, but rather well in Mid and East Antrim, the heartland of unionism - and at the expense of TUV. The UUP, despite its ongoing slide, is still the stronger unionist party in much of the nationalist half of Northern Ireland, and did relatively well in affluent Lisburn and Castlereagh.

The Ulster Unionists, in inexorable decline since they helped forge the Good Friday Agreement, remains the principal force of unionism in Fermanagh and Omagh and Mid Ulster. Traditional Unionist Voice had a bad election overall but more or less held its own in the two districts it has established itself: Antrim and Newtownabbey and Mid and East Antrim.

The eleven local authorities that replaced the 23 former districts in 2014 comprise, with the exception of Belfast and, to a lesser extent Armagh, Craigavon and Banbridge, authorities in which one community or the other dominates: there are no council areas where the nationalist and unionist communities are evenly balanced.

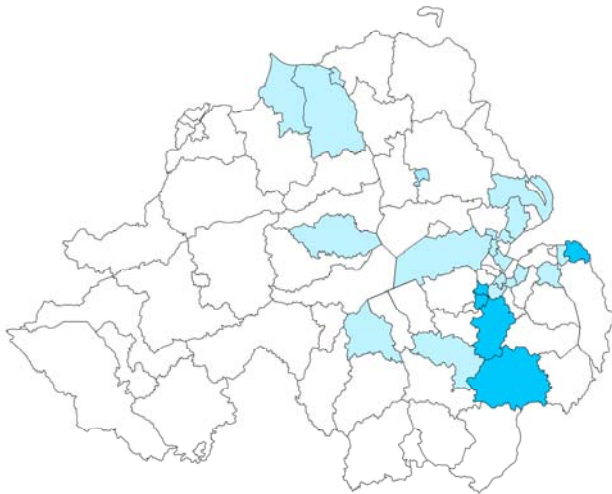

You will, however, find one - maybe two - District Electoral Areas (the Northern Ireland version of wards in Great Britain) enclaves within local authorities where the minority community is dominant. In Causeway Coast and Glens, which covers the entire north of the province, such enclaves bookend the district: The Glens on the north eastern coast, and Benbradagh by Lough Foyle are two heavily nationalist DEAs in an otherwise staunchly Unionist District. Likewise, Faughan DEA in Derry and Stabane, and Rowallane DEA in Newry, Mourne and Down are relatively strong Unionist DEAs in majority nationalist districts.

The electoral system used in Northern Ireland matters immensely. An electoral system is not benign, inconsequential or neutral: it is an actor that shapes the behaviour of both parties and voters. You can see that in the attempts at limiting pro- or anti-Brexit choices in Great Britain's first past the post general election. Under the Single Transferable Vote, tactics come into play even more. It is simply untrue to say STV gives voters more choice - it might do in the theoretical dreaming of an academic ivory tower but in operation, on the ground it does not. It reduces choice, it limits

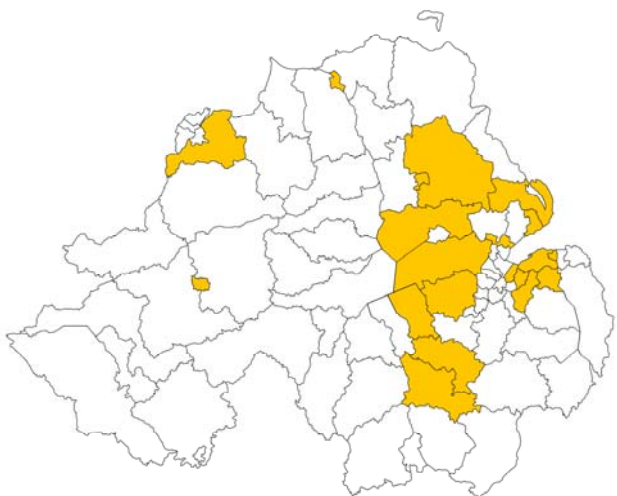

But the purpose of this introduction is not to critique proportional representation but to analyse the consequences of it. One of the crucial aspects of this system is that it stratifies and bakes in sectarian politics. There is not one election with all parties in a bun-fight for every seat. Rather one should look at it as an electrical cord, with a green, nationalist wire, and an orange, Unionist wire; entirely separate, never connecting to each other.

By this I mean that because politics is still so polarised, but also relatively stable, here it is very rare to find, for example, a unionist candidate gaining a seat from a nationalist party - and vice versa. The main way that might happen is if the nationalist or unionist community in a DEA has grown or shrunk sufficiently in the time since the last poll to alter that overall sectarian balance. Because DEAs are so large that is rare. No, take a look at any individual DEA result in the pages that follow, and look at the point a candidate gets eliminated. If that candidate is a unionist, you will see - almost uniformly - that virtually none of their votes will transfer to an SDLP candidate, and almost exactly zero will ever go to Sinn Fein. They may transfer to a different unionist but they will not cross wires, as it were and jump over to the green side. That is not surprising, of course, but what it does is create twin track elections within a DEA: there is a battle between nationalist candidates to win the number of councillors their sectarian strength can achieve in each place, and a separate one for unionists with theirs, with the occasional non-sectarian sniping off a seat here or there.

Another of the imagined purposes of such a system is to drive voters towards the centre, because as candidates of the fringes fall off, the assumption is that a voter's subsequent choices will then be towards a candidate they dislike less than the fringes from the other side. You will need to look closely at how transfers go DEA by DEA but clearly, as politics in the province is dominated by the hardest line Unionist Party - the DUP, and by the hardest line nationalist party - Sinn Fein, again that theory simply has not played out in reality.

And whilst 2019 was the best year for minor parties to gain representation, the system has not facilitated a blooming of such parties, nor support for those that have tried to eke out an existence on this rugged sectarian plain. Take Belfast, the most diverse local authority. There are now eight parties represented on the council but only three are non-sectarian. One of these, the People Before Profits Alliance (PBPA) is only competitive in nationalist areas as a left-wing challenger to Sinn Fein (it holds the only non-SF seat in Black Mountain DEA for example). All bar one of the Alliance Party's councillors in Belfast represent wards on the eastern side of the city; the more affluent half. Independents performed well in terms of seats but received fewer votes than in 2014.

And minor parties beyond the Alliance and Green Party did very poorly - principally because of the disappearance of Basil McCrea's Northern Ireland 21 party, that performed rather well in 2014; and because UKIP, which also had a reasonably good 2014 set of elections, collapsed entirely. The Conservative Party contests a handful of DEAs in the province, principally in Ards and North Down, but has got no life in it. That said, minor parties in Northern Ireland have fared better under STV here than in Scotland, which uses a similar system for its local elections.

But perhaps the most bizarre consequence of the way STV warps the party political contest came in Belfast. Chris McGimpsey, a longstanding Ulster Unionist councillor who lost his seat in May and then sued his own party for having the temerity to field more than one candidate there for breach of contract.

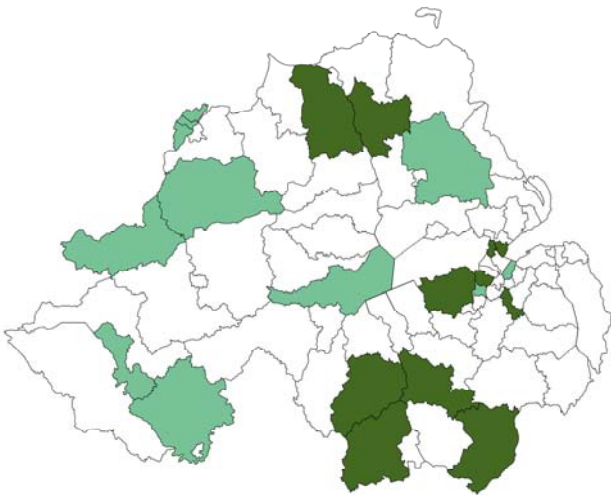

Mr McGimpsey's case exposes the fallacy of the principal alleged virtue of the system acclaimed by its supporters: that it enables voters not just to choose between parties but between candidates within those parties.

Here is a candidate suing his own party for providing that choice - at least partially (the UUP still only contested two of the six Lisnasharragh seats). The reality is that political parties under any electoral system will always attempt to game it for their own advantage. It no more suits the leadership of a Northern Irish political party to give the voters the widest range of choice than it would for the leadership of any party to present internal candidates opposed to their direction of leadership to stand.

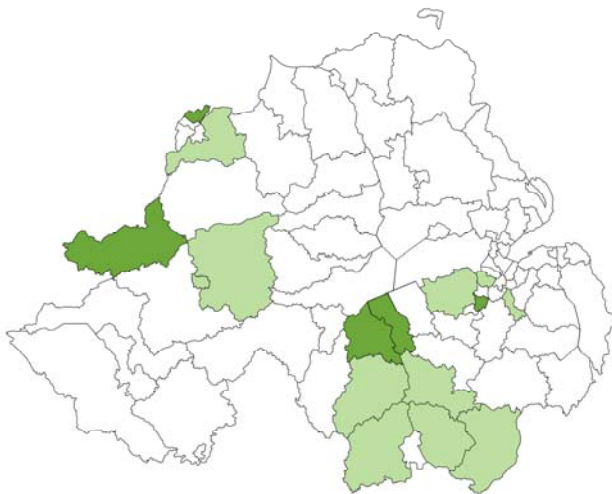

And even if they could field a full slate of ideologically identical candidates, they still would not - simply because they do not trust voters to transfer their votes between their own candidates. A large proportion of voters do not use all their transfers (a reason, incidentally, why the claim that a different PR system - Alternative Vote - guarantees a candidate wins 50% of the vote is false). So, under STV, parties calculate how strong their vote is in each DEA, and field as many candidates - but no more - as they believe that vote can elect. Choice is curtailed, the system is gamed and, when they get their calculations wrong, long-standing councillors like Mr McGimpsey lose.

This is just the most significant difference between the electoral system used in Northern Ireland and that used in England and Wales for electing councillors.

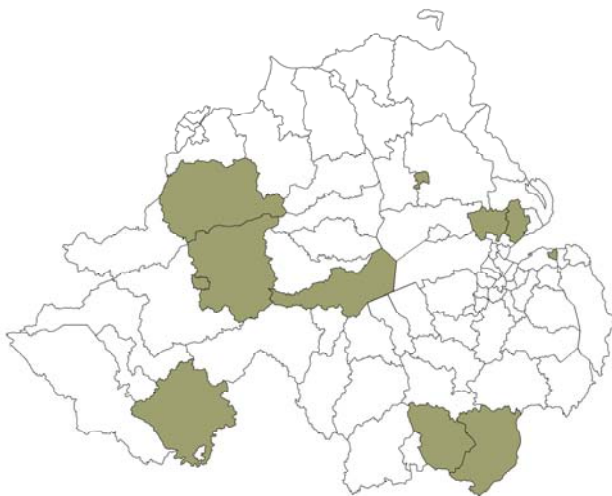

In the tables that follow, all the transfers (rounded down on the basis that however much the Electoral Reform fetishists wish to claim otherwise, you cannot have a point-whatever of a vote) are shown. In the top right of each DEA table are three shaded boxes, which show the total first preference votes for unionist candidates (orange), nationalists (green) and non-sectarians (cream). This gives a clearer idea of how strongly Unionist or nationalist each DEA is. Candidates are allocated in order of their first preference vote.
